The Nihongo Way 2

< Today's dialogue >

A: やあ、どうも。 Yah, dōmo.	A: 先日はどうも。 Senjitsu wa dōmo.	A: それじゃ、どうも。 Soreja, dōmo.
B: いやあ、どうも、どうも。 Iyah, dōmo dōmo.	B: いやいや、こちらこそ、どうも。 Iyaiya, kochira koso dōmo.	B: あ、どうも。 Ah, dōmo.

Following last month's kick-off column on Japanese greetings, let me continue by introducing a few more Nihongo greetings.

DIALOGUE OVERVIEW

The above dialog could be translated as:

- A1: Say! I'm sorry for keeping silent for a while, sir?
B1: Oh, well! I'm sorry, too but how are you, sir?
A2: Thank you for what you did for me the other day.
B2: Oh, no. My thanks should go to YOU.
A3: Well, good-bye for now.
B3: Oh, good-bye now.

I'm sure you wonder how it is that the short Japanese utterances above can possibly translate into such lengthy English sentences when the originals say virtually nothing but dōmo.

One of my goals today is to reveal the secret of this mystery to you.

VOCABULARY FOCUS

Dômo

Dô (pronounced as “doh”) is an interrogative word meaning “how” or “(in) what way.” When the phrase-particle mo (meaning “also” or “even”) is attached to it, its meaning becomes “every how” or “in every way.” This happens with other interrogative words, too. Here are some examples:

doko (where) → dokomo (everywhere)

dore (which one of the given items) → doremo (every one of them)

dochira (which one of the two) → dochiramo (both of the two) itsu (when) → itsumo (every when, i.e. always) dare (who) → daremo (every who, i.e. everybody)*

nani (what) → nanimo (every what, i.e. everything)*

*While daremo and nanimo are technically possible, daremokamo and nanimokamo are commonly used instead for “all-ness.” In negative sentences daremo and nanimo are usually used and mean “nobody” and “nothing.”

In all of the dialogs above, dômo is just the beginning of longer possible sentences:

Dômo shitsurei-shiteimasu. (In every way I’ve been rude.)

Dômo gokigen ikaga desu ka? (In every way how have you been?)

Dômo sumimasen. (In every way it does not end, i.e., I’m indebted. I’m sorry)

Dômo arigatô gozaimasu. (In every way it is precious, i.e., I’m thankful.)

Dômo shitsurei-shimasu. (In every way I’m being rude for leaving you, i.e., Goodbye now.)

Hesitation Noises

Words such as ah, yah, and soreja, as used above, are hesitation noises, which do not actually mean much, just as “oh,” “ah,” “uh,” “well,” “say,” “then,” etc. often carry little meaning in English.

Senjitsu

Senjitsu and konoaida mean the same thing (“the other day”). While konoaida is what is called wago (an authentic Japanese word), senjitsu is kango (a Chinese origin word). In principle, kango sound more formal and stiff than wago.

Iyaiya

Iyaiya is repetition of iya, for emphasis. Iya in turn is a variation of iie (meaning “no”). Iya sounds less formal than iie.

Kochira koso

Kochira is one of the so-called ko-so-a-do series of words. Kochira indicates the speaker’s domain, sochira refers to the addressee’s domain, and achira points to somewhere away from both the speaker and the addressee. Each can also often politely mean, respectively, “me/us,” “you” and “he/she/they.”

Koso is a phrase-particle that provides emphasis. By virtue of adding koso, kochira is emphasized. In this case, kochira koso could translate to “It’s ME (that should thank YOU).”

CULTURE FOCUS

In a way, Japanese are lazy people: We tend to say only what is needed, and commonly do not mention what is contextually obvious.

In a scene such as this, where no particular message is called for, the fact that the two men communicated with each other is more important than what was actually said.

In Japanese, many greetings follow this pattern. The initial word of a phrase or sentence alone constitutes the greeting.

OTHER EXAMPLES

こんにちは。 Konnichiwa.

Konnichi is an old word meaning “today,” and wa is a phrase-particle marking the topic for the moment. Literally, therefore, it means “as for today” or just “today.” Of course, it implies something like “Today (how are you doing?)” or “Today, (are you fine?)” It is a greeting used in daytime.

こんばんは。 Kombanwa.

As you might know already, komban means “this evening.” I’m sure you can now tell the phrase’s implication. This is a greeting for late in the day.

さようなら。 Sayonara.

Sayo (pronounced as “sayoh”) is an old Japanese term equivalent to the modern “so,” and so (pronounced “soh”) in turn happens to mean “so” in English. Meanwhile, “X nara” translates to “if it is X.” Together, therefore, sayonara literally translates as “if it is so,” which implies “if things are as such, it’s time that I went” - in other words, “Goodbye.”
